

Why I Serve on the MIBH Impact Board

Throughout my military career, I've had the privilege of serving alongside extraordinary men and women who willingly accepted extraordinary risks in service to our nation. Some of those wounds are visible. Others are not.

I serve on the Marcus Institute for Brain Health Impact Board because I believe our responsibility to those who serve doesn't end when the mission does. It continues through recovery, hope, and helping people reclaim the lives they fought to protect.

What inspires me about MIBH is that it doesn't simply treat traumatic brain injury. It restores possibility. It brings together world-class science, compassionate care, and an unwavering commitment to Service Members, Veterans, Law Enforcement, and First Responders, along with the families who stand beside them.

Serving as the inaugural chair of the Impact Board is an opportunity to help connect people, ideas, and resources so that more individuals can access that hope. If my experience, relationships, and leadership can help even one more person reclaim their future, then I'll know I've continued serving a mission that never really ended.
