

SEED Follow-Up Studies Family Resource Guide

July 2023

Adapted from:

Thank you for participating in the Study to Explore Early Development (SEED) Follow-Up Studies. We hope this resource packet will be helpful. Please remember to talk to a health care provider or teacher if you have concerns about your health or development, or the health and development of anyone in your family.

You can also call 211 to find local resources for any need. 211 is a designated number for information and referrals to social services, like finding food, paying bills, and coping with mental health issues or substance abuse.

Common terms relevant to adolescents and adults with autism and other developmental disabilities are listed below. Please note that these are some of the common terms relevant to adolescents and adults with autism and other developmental disabilities. This is not a complete list of terms that might be useful.

- Advocacy is the public support of oneself or another person with a developmental disability.
- Autism or other developmental disability waivers allow people to receive certain services in their homes or communities. Waivers are generally available until 21 years of age if eligibility requirements are met.
- Cognitive-Behavioral Therapy (CBT) focuses on how thinking influences feelings and behaviors. CBT is useful in treating depression, anxiety, and other mental health conditions.
- Developmental disabilities are present before 18 years of age and impact cognitive, language, physical, or social development, and/or daily living abilities.
- Executive functioning describes a set of mental skills that help people plan, monitor, and accomplish goals. Some executive functions are shifting attention, solving problems, and controlling behaviors.
- Individualized Education Plan (IEP) is a plan that identifies the individual educational needs of a student and how the school will address those needs.
- Neurodiversity refers to the range of differences in brain and behavioral functioning that exist in the human population and are associated with strengths and challenges at every part of the spectrum.
- Post-secondary education is any education that comes after high school. It can include certificate programs, as well as associates and other college degrees.
- Service cliff is a phrase sometimes used to describe the loss of services children with developmental disabilities may experience when they become an adult.
- Social stories are simple stories that help people with autism and other developmental disabilities better prepare for and understand common social events.
- Special education is instruction designed for an individual student to meet his/her unique learning needs.
- Transition planning helps students decide what to do after high school. Transition planning for students with an IEP starts by age 16 years, or earlier in some states.
- Vocational training helps people with developmental disabilities develop the skills necessary for employment.

The following is a list of resources compiled from various websites, resource books, and anecdotal research. The list is not exhaustive and contact information is subject to change. Colorado LEND, JFK Partners, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, and Colorado SEED do not specifically endorse any of the providers, services, or programs.
